

Developing a Technology Strategy

April 1, 2009

By Ed McCarthy, CFP®

Originally published in Journal Financial Planning magazine

You've finally got your firm's technology under control. The software supports your business efficiently, the hardware is working reliably, and you can concentrate on serving clients instead of servicing servers.

Then the problems begin: two vendors that supply critical software packages just announced major upgrades and you're not convinced the upgrades are critical or cost-justified.

Download PDF